What's spicy this evening

Queensland parents are fuming about plans for some schools to trial a 'four-day week' with Wednesday being picked as the designated 'day off' where kids might be able to explore 'alternate learning' ... or they may join the record-level of teenage wannabe criminals threatening communities with machetes. Teachers, particularly in Brisbane, are excited about being paid the same for fewer hours at work, but children and parents are set to be the real losers of this next Labor experiment in how to destroy everything in society.

Michael de Percy has written an excellent column stating, ‘In the absence of journalism that gives a voice to the trials and travails of the common people, the fourth estate – and therefore liberal democracy itself – is under threat.’ There is a little bit of interesting Spectator Australia history in there as well.

The IPA’s Brianna McKee looks at the price women and families are paying at the hands of the Labor government’s relentless push to increase worker productivity. There’s a reason Western women are having fewer children and why so many families have to rely on childcare from increasingly younger ages.

When it comes to the next US Presidential election, the Democrats have painted themselves into a Biden-shaped corner, with it becoming increasingly obvious that they have no other viable candidates. After all, they can hardly offer up Kamala Harris.

And in the Spectator World section, there has been a lot of commentary regarding the future of Remembrance, in particular the protest marches in the UK which many are dubbing ‘hate marches’, and the fate of political figures who dared to call out the disrespectful nature of those who chose to use a day of mourning to protest. John Keiger even went so far as to ask if the world could end up in another global conflict.

Given that we are still fighting with Facebook, we’ve started an Instagram account for Speccie TV which you can follow here.
